

Another theme that has emerged from our research on religious, cultural and social justice clubs is what students learn about the world around them. By looking at the various video clips, you'll see that some students learned just how little their peers actually know about the world beyond their classrooms, their schools, and their homes. One such example comes from a participant in a Me-to-We club. Other students have learned that the world is diverse. Wherever you turn there are different types of diversity, including socio-economic, religious and so on.

Please explore the video clips so that you can find out for yourself about what the students have learned about the world beyond, within the school, and beyond the borders of the school.
