Just their own capacity to make a difference. In the clubs I'm running, I think that they have responsibility. They are starting to feel the burden of responsibility in making their High School years count for something. This isn't just about coming and getting 85 or 90% in your subject to get into the university of your choice, but they are interested in global citizenship and what their part can be in that. And I think that when there is something close to home, like First Nations Awareness, and we can travel an hour and a half away from here and see life on a reserve, that they feel that this is relevant to me and I play a part in this and I'm part or I could be part of the problem or part of the solution. They do bring a lot of maturity to it. They are interested. Sometimes I think they are tentative steps because it may feel almost like too much responsibility.
