

I think that through the ESL Drama and the ESL Ambassador's Club, what they start to realize is they learn that other students have a lot in common with them. And so the challenges that they face in their lives are not so different in other cultures. And that is also understood as well in the ESL Drama club through our work with U of T. And we sort of had these separations between native speakers and ELLs and the biggest epiphany of that research for the students was "Wow, we share the same kinds of challenges!" So, that understanding that we may come from different religious backgrounds, cultural backgrounds, but really we share so much. And in understanding that, then it's breaking down all kinds of stereotypes and barriers and it's bringing us together.
